"You do not need to sacrifice huge efforts, or large amounts of money, to make 10 grams of explosives, or more or less, and do not search for long for these material as they are in your mother's kitchen and between your hands, and in every city you reach, and you will reach what Abu al-Kheir<sup>1</sup> has reached, may Allah have mercy on him. Make it [material] in the shape of a grenade to throw, or [an explosive] to time, or your ignite it from a distance, or a martyrdom belt, or any electronic device like a stereo by which you listen to the tones of the explosives, or a picture frame, or a paper folder, or a letter envelope, and bombed with it any tyrant, or intelligence forces den, or a prince, or a minister, or a crusader wherever you find them, and also in airports in the western crusade countries that participated in the war against Muslims; or on their planes, or in their residential complexes or their subways."

<sup>1</sup> "Abu al-Kheir" is the nickname for Abdullah Aseri, the most wanted Saudi Al-Qaida member who managed to ingest an explosive and sneak it through airport security in Saudi Arabia and Yemen in an August 2009 attempt to assassinate Saudi Interior Minister Prince Nayif.
